Er man ved at overlade kontrol med produktion af yellowcake i Grønland til en person, eller personkreds, som er involveret i kriminelle aktiviteter og muligvis har kontakt til piratgrupper i den somaliske Puntland-provins som er omfattet af den danske terrorlovgivning?

Er det i det mindste ikke bedst at få dette afkræftet før man tildeler disse personer en udnyttelsestilladelse?

SACKED cops, drunken geologists, underworld figures and pirates - it's amazing who pops up in the business deals of mining prospector Mihran Shemesian.

The man is better known to Full Disclosure readers as "Mick Manynames" because there are more than a dozen different spellings of his name on official documents.

His latest deal just might attract the attention of the Takeovers Panel, as companies that Shemesian controls seem to own more than 20 per cent of listed Greenland Minerals and Energy - beyond the threshold that would require a takeover bid.

Best known by its sharemarket code of GGG, the company has a tenement in Greenland that is prospective for uranium and rare earths. The problem is, the anti-uranium party won the recent election in Greenland.

But even that hasn't put a dampener on the GGG share price. It has touched highs of 65¢ this year.

The major shareholder in GGG is GCM Nominees, which is controlled by Shemesian. It has 35 million shares, or 15.7 per cent, of the stock.

Shemesian also controls a "corporate advisory" outfit in the United Arab Emirates called Gravner.

Last year Gravner was granted 37 million options in Boss Energy, as part of a deal that involved former Victoria Police sergeant Joseph Obeid. In 1998, Obeid was dismissed from the police after being found guilty of five of seven disciplinary charges against him. He has since worked for Range Resources, another Shemesian deal.
