Dear Pia Kjærsgaard!

The right to health is one of the fundamental rights of every human being regardless of race, religion, political belief, economic or social condition. Health is the most important factor in achieving security and well-being, both for man and for the whole state.

Governments must take responsibility for the health of their citizens, which should be expressed in providing free medical care to the socially unprotected strata of the population. In the states, where the governments pay little attention to health care support, the quality of medicines, the hepatitis, tuberculosis, AIDS, malaria and other serious diseases are rapidly spreading. Therefore these are considered to be serious threats to the world community, especially with the current trend of migration around the world.

We, the International peacekeeping social organization "Institute of peace" call to protect the health of the citizens of their country, especially children and ensure maximum control of the quality of medicinal products. The human right to life can be achieved only when people are healthy and protected from any kind of diseases.

Best regards, Director
